Q: Reading data from a file I'm trying to add some data to a hash in Perl, and at some point in the code, I have to use the data from the hash in order to calculate some other data. The problem is, I don't want to use the hash until I need to. Can I read the data from the file and only store it in the hash when I need to use it in the code? I have tried:

my %data; my $lookup_data = 'file/with/data'; open ($fp, $lookup_data) or die "Can't open file: $lookup_data"; my $header_data = ; while (defined ($header_data)) { $_ = $header_data; print

`$data{'header'} = $_; }` but it seems like the file either isn't getting read in, or the data isn't being stored in the `%data` hash. Is there any way to do

An exploratory investigation of the relationship between suicidal ideation and exposure to violence and harassment among college students. This study was designed to examine the relationship between suicidal ideation and exposure to violence and harassment among college students. The prevalence of suicidal ideation in this study was 7.1%, with comparable rates of suicidal ideation in both sexes, and among both ethnic and sexual minority groups. The 3-month prevalence of violence and harassment was higher than the 6-month prevalence. There was a significant relationship between suicidal ideation and exposure to violence and harassment for the 3-month prevalence of violence and harassment, but not for the 6-month prevalence. Exploratory analyses indicated that both variables were significantly related with suicidal ideation for men, but not women. Suicidal ideation was associated with exposure to violence and harassment for men, suggesting that men's vulnerability to suicide may be enhanced by exposure to violence and harassment. However, these findings should be replicated with longitudinal data. Novel dual functional osteoconductive scaffold derived from chitosan. A well-designed scaffold can serve as a structural support for in vitro studies of bone formation and then be replaced by well-interconnected, mechanically strong bone in vivo. The ideal scaffold for bone regeneration must be non-toxic, non-immunogenic, biodegradable, osteoconductive and show functional affinity for cell adhesion, migration, and proliferation. In the present work, we fabricated a novel nano-composite scaffold consisting of chitosan and hydroxyapatite nanoparticles. In vitro analysis of the scaffold shows that it may exhibit an improved performance compared to pure chitosan when used as a material for bone
